Review

US rates ticked up sharply in the beginning of the month and remained elevated throughout. This was driven by the unexpectedly strong headline and core inflation print which reignited the narrative of a higher terminal rate. Towards the end of the month, the closely-watched personal consumption expenditures (PCE) inflation also confirmed the uptick. While the implications of a single month of higher inflation is uncertain, this will place higher scrutiny on the following inflation prints. Following the data releases in February, Fed Fund Futures priced out initial expectations of a multiple rate cuts in June to only one rate cut.

In China, the biggest surprise was the 25 basis point reduction in the five year loan prime rate (LPR) to 3.95% in terms of timing and magnitude, which sent a strong signal that the government is increasingly concerned about financial contagion from the property sector, given the five year LPR is generally used for mortgage pricing. This is in line with our expectations of stronger policy stimulus.

Credit performance was dominated by the swings in the mid-belly of the rates curve. The Fund remained defensive during the period, returning -0.08%^.

During the period, the Bloomberg Asia Ex-Japan USD Credit China Investment Grade Index returned -0.28% and the FTSE APAC-Select Investment-Grade Green Impact USD Bond Index returned -0.47%.

Outlook

There has been little to derail Asian credit spreads which have remained tight despite the rates move. We maintain the view that the all-in yield provides attractive opportunities for investors in both investment grade and high yield. Further, the large glut of supply in the US has not been replicated in Asia, with moderate issuance from green bonds aside from South Korea. We expect only sovereigns such as Hong Kong to increase supply this year, as such we will adjust allocations towards regions with a stronger fundamental improvement story.

We continue to like the front end of the curve but prefer to shift towards the mid-end as opportunities arise with new issuance to lock-in yields. We do not see new green issuance from Asia pushing spreads wider given the supply is relatively well controlled.

The major stock exchanges in China has introduced new ESG disclosure requirements that requires additional information to reduce the risk of greenwashing, including scope 3 greenhouse gas (GHG) emissions. This will come into effect in 2026. We also anticipate mention funding for green projects at the upcoming National People's Congress.
